RE to be included in the National Curriculum!

What a historic moment! The news, this week, that the Curriculum and Assessment Review is recommending that RE should work towards becoming a National Curriculum subject has been widely welcomed.

The report states that there is a 'strong consensus about the subject's importance and its essential place in a school's curriculum', and that 'RE's importance is not currently reflected in its standing in the curriculum'.

It therefore recommends a 'staged approach to reform', to bring RE into the NC. This will entail the setting up of a diverse group of interested parties to establish a blueprint for the subject. Watch this space.

The Reason for the Season?

This 'tongue in cheek' image is supposed to help us ask a question about how much our modern Christmas celebrations are linked to the Christian gospel accounts of the birth of Jesus. (Some scholars contest the accuracy of some of the statements made here, but it is a useful thinking point.) In what sense does it matter if Christmas is a celebration of the birth of Jesus or not?

You can find an in-depth discussion of 'Christmas: Pagan or Christian' on the Rest is History podcast
